Properties of head-cap connection in acrylamide-induced polyacrylamide hydrogel. We have developed a new technique for micro-fluidic cell culture using polyacrylamide (PAA) gels, and have determined the permeability, density, and flow properties of PAA. To the best of our knowledge, there have not been any previous works on the properties of PAA. In this paper, we show how we have measured the permeability and thickness of PAA hydrogel. The permeability of PAA hydrogel was measured from a filtration experiment and the thickness was determined by comparing the retention volume with the Q values. The flow properties of PAA hydrogel were also measured. This new micro-fluidic technique was applied to the study of cell responses. The results show that this system is useful to examine cell-cell interactions in micro-fluid

Prader-Willi syndrome (PWS) is a developmental disorder characterized by obesity, central hypothyroidism and hyperphagia. PWS and related genetic disorders belong to the group of imprinting diseases. We describe two brothers with PWS, who had increased appetite, weight gain and hyperphagia at the age of 10 and 12 years, respectively. Despite lack of suspicion of PWS and their relative late onset of symptoms, both brothers had DNA-testing and both received recommendations for changing life style. This might be of relevance for future symptomatic children of PWS families.
